The politics of identity and citizenship has assumed increasing importance as our polities have become significantly more culturally, ethnically and religiously diverse. Different types of scholars, including philosophers, sociologists, political scientists and historians make contributions to this field and this series showcases a variety of innovative contributions to it. Focusing on a range of different countries, and utilizing the insights of different disciplines, the series helps to illuminate an increasingly controversial area of research and titles in it will be of interest to a number of audiences including scholars, students and other interested individuals.

Given that this book has been almost thirty years in the making, I have accrued a great many debts during the course of its production.

The first, and by far the greatest, such debt is owed to my parents. This is also a debt that is difficult to repay in words. Suffice it to say that my gratitude to them for their emotional and financial support is limitless.

A great number of people in the academic community also deserve credit for the appearance of this book – or blame, depending on what you think about the material that follows. Various members of the History department at the University of York helped to shape my general but vague preference for all the school subjects that were not hard sciences into an enjoyment of historical narrative and analysis. Chief amongst them were Prof Liz Buettner, Prof Pete Biller, and Dr Henrice Altink. It is possibly accidental that my current historical interests so closely resemble a composite of their own – they just got to me first – but I have never regretted my choice of field.

At Oxford, where this book originated as a D Phil thesis, Dr John Davis and Dr Simon Skinner deserve the deepest appreciation. John, as my supervisor, had the most significant influence on the thesis intellectually, whilst Simon did a great job of orienting me at an institution I nevertheless still find somewhat mysterious. Both have been, and continue to be, invaluable sources of career support and guidance. So too is Prof Stephen Tuck, and the man also really knows how to barbecue. Dr Matthew Grimley and Dr Jane Garnett have also stepped in with advice and references, and have left marks upon the content of this book.

The rich and challenging intellectual environment of Oxford has also provided me with a number of opportunities to air, and hopefully sharpen, aspects of the argument that follows. In addition to the above faculty members, questions and challenges from Dr William Whyte, Prof Lawrence Goldman, and Prof Jamie Belich stand out as having required particularly careful revision on my part.

Throughout 2015 and 2016, I was a postdoctoral research fellow at The Oxford Research Centre in the Humanities (TORCH). It was during this period that thesis became book. Socially and intellectually, the environment at TORCH is, in my experience, unmatched in academia. The stimulation, support, and succour offered there by (in addition to Prof Tuck) Dr Justine McConnell, Dr Ruth Scobie, Dr Robin Whelan, Dr Alice Kelly, soon-to-be Drs Jono Taylor and Timothy Farrant, Laura Miller, and the industrious-cum-intimidating Victoria McGuinness-Francis have meant a great deal.

Outside of Oxford, the efforts of Prof John Eade stand out. He has been a vital interlocutor at stages of the project, and his general support and guidance has been constant and offered always with remarkable celerity and grace. He also kindly allowed me to view some of his own private collected ephemera that are referenced below.

At Palgrave, I am indebted to the anonymous peer-reviewers who helped guide some of the more recent revisions made to the book, and to the editors of the “Politics of Identity and Citizenship” series for kindly allowing me to contribute to a series of fine books from which I have learned so much. In particular, the perceptive interventions of Prof Varun Uberoi, though coming at a late stage, have helped me to considerably improve this book. I also, of course, owe much gratitude to the editorial team.

Finally, I am grateful to the staff at each and every archival institution I have visited in the course of my research. They have supplied me with history’s crooked timber; what follows reflects my attempts to straighten it out.
