Palgrave Studies in Nineteenth-Century Writing and Culture is a monograph series that aims to represent the most innovative research on literary works that were produced in the English-speaking world from the time of the Napoleonic Wars to the fin de siècle. Attentive to the historical continuities between 'Romantic' and 'Victorian', the series will feature studies that help scholarship to reassess the meaning of these terms during a century marked by diverse cultural, literary, and political movements. The main aim of the series is to look at the increasing influence of types of historicism on our understanding of literary forms and genres. It reflects the shift from critical theory to cultural history that has affected not only the period 1800-1900 but also every field within the discipline of English literature. All titles in the series seek to offer fresh critical perspectives and challenging readings of both canonical and non-canonical writings of this era.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book developed from a PhD thesis that I completed at the University of Leicester in 2015. As such, a great deal of gratitude goes to my supervisors Holly Furneaux and Douglas Tallack for their indispensable insight, encouragement, and advice throughout. Warm thanks also go to the research community at Leicester for untold help and support across many discussions, seminars, reading groups, and pints of beer. I would also like to thank the series editor, Joseph Bristow, for his thorough and critical editing and advice.

The post-PhD wilderness can be a difficult place, and my family and friends deserve much gratitude for patiently supporting and humouring me over the last few years. In particular, I would like to thank my parents who have always encouraged and nurtured my intellectual curiosity, even when it took me to strange places, and my wife's parents whose many roast dinners always provide a very welcome respite.

Finally, the unsung hero of all my work is my wife Claire, without whom this would never have made it to publication.
