Preface

There can be no doubt that HR governance is a highly important topic for corporations, public institutions, and other organizations alike. Positioned between the fields of corporate governance, management, and human resource management, it may well be considered the missing link between them. However, it has been widely ignored by both scholars and practitioners. Given its substantial organizational impact, it must certainly play a major role in theory and practice, as the international norm “ISO 30408” on human governance underlines convincingly. Unfortunately, while the dominating literature sources never fail to stress its importance, they describe the concept rather vaguely and fail to precisely establish how it relates to adjacent concepts.

Indeed, HR governance is no intuitive matter. In our attempt to clarify and theoretically integrate the concept, we were surprised as well as intrigued to realize that well-known and familiar concepts, like corporate governance, general management, and HR/leadership, reveal their actual vagueness during the attempt to integrate them. So, as we went, first these concepts had to be specified before we could integrate them into a coherent definition of HR governance. We are convinced that our theoretic solutions, developed during many long discussions, will prove useful to scholars as well as practitioners as they provide necessary conceptual clarity that has been lacking. The constructs treated are of paramount relevance for various lines of current discussions including the very role of management or managerial positions in modern organizations.

The aim of this first edition is to quickly define the freshly emerging topic and allow for its coherent future development. This is our aim by introducing our thoughts into the debate. It is our hope that our new definition will stir the debate on HR governance and help the concept gain momentum. Future publications will certainly be more extensive as emerging literature and research, as well as illustrative corporate examples, are integrated. We hope this approach will find the reader’s approval and look forward to any kind of constructive feedback.

We would like to express our gratitude to Oliver Maas of maasgestaltet for the appealing graphic design of the illustrations, as well as to Lorri King for her most professional proofreading and helpful suggestions.

About the Authors

Boris Kaehler is a professor of human resource management at Merseburg University of Applied Sciences in Germany. Prior to his academic career, he gained ten years of professional experience as an HR business partner and head of HR in German corporations, attending to all facets of modern human resource management and day-to-day personnel work. In addition to his academic duties, he works as an HR strategy consultant specializing in leadership guidelines, human resource management strategy, and HR governance.

Jens Grundei is a professor of corporate governance and organization at Quadriga University in Berlin where he leads the MBA elective “organization.” His work concentrates on organizational design, in particular the assessment of alternative organizational forms. He has served as a member of the review board of Organization Science and as a member of the executive board of German Association for Organization. He advises on matters of governance and organization design.
