When it succeeds, the unity of teaching and research can be so rewarding! This book speaks to the possibility of uniting the academic duty of lecturing and the joy of research. I would like to thank the wonderful former students who accompanied me on the long journey from seminar to seminar to book publication. Beginning in the summer semester of 2012, we explored gentrification and displacement in a series of modules in the Masters program "Geography of Urbanization" at the Humboldt University of Berlin. These seminars—in which there was intense debate and collaboration in the classroom—led to the chapters in this collection. During these classes I was, time and time again, deeply impressed by the persistence and commitment of the students to work hard and transform their project reports into publishable papers. This inspiring experience will remain with me, and help me to continue searching for the synergies between research and teaching. A heartfelt thanks also goes to Matthias Bernt, Daniel Förste, Andrej Holm, and Guido Schulz for enriching what was originally a student project with their contributions. For the English edition of the book I am very much indebted to a group of talented translators who were assembled by Sandra Lustig. And last but not least: I am enormously grateful for the kindness, prudence, reliability and all encompassing support of Francesca Weber-Newth. She was so valuable in the production of this English edition, that it simply would not have been possible without her. She is a postdoc in my wonderful cultural and social geography department at the Humboldt University of Berlin. I am grateful and humbled to have such gifted young scholars around me.
