It's a black and white photograph, but it captures the light of a summer afternoon in 1959.

The man has a plucky nose, an honest chin, and a moustache in the style of Clark Gable.

The girl is a very beautiful brunette. Her smile is ecstatic; his, incredulous. Both of them, in love.

This year we're celebrating their golden wedding.

To my parents

Acknowledgments

Every book is a voyage.

Without my wife Pilar and my children Irene and Hector, it would not have been a voyage but a wreckage.

Without the help of numerous friends and colleagues, it would have been much more difficult to find a safe harbor. The list is long and the memory of the old sailor weak. Thus, I prefer to extend here my acknowledgment to all of them without spelling their names. You all know.

I am grateful for the kindness of the Spanish Nuclear Council and the Foro Nuclear, who have supplied information concerning Spanish nuclear power stations.
