ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many people and institutions have helped me to achieve this book. I would like to thank the Society for the Furtherance of Critical Philosophy for awarding me a Paul Branton Research Fellowship to allow me to undertake the research; Dr Rene Saran and Dr Pat Shipley, Trustees of the Society, commented very helpfully on my work, encouraged me and gave me many ideas. Brunel University allowed me leave of absence to carry out the fieldwork and the University of East Anglia has also given me leave in order to complete the writing of the book. Henley Management College made me a Visiting Senior Research Fellow for the duration of the work and Professor Pat Joynt there offered many useful comments on the case studies which were published as Henley Working Papers.

I particularly want to thank all the people who participated in the study and shared their views frankly with me; also, my sincere thanks go to the eight organisations which allowed me to work with them. I have discussed the project with academic colleagues too numerous to mention at conferences and seminars, especially those organised by the European Business Studies Network (EBEN-UK) and the Centre for Organisational and Professional Ethics (at Brunel and Buckingham College), and I am grateful for their comments and friendly criticisms. Two of my former colleagues at Brunel, Professor Christopher Pollitt (now at Erasmus University) and the late John Quinn, were especially encouraging and helpful. My special thanks go to my husband, Michael Miller, for his moral support during the project and for many challenging discussions on ethics and responsibility. I am immeasurably in his debt for designing and operating numerous editing macros, and for taking charge of converting the text and index into camera-ready copy for publication.
