NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS

Rhino Ariefiansyah is a filmmaker and adjunct lecturer at the Department of Anthropology, University of Indonesia (UI). His research has mainly focused on environmental issues and how they relate to knowledge production. Since 2009, he has been a member of the Department's trans- and inter-disciplinary research team, which convenes the Science Field Shops with farmers in West Java and East Lombok.

Avyanthi Azis is a lecturer at the Department of International Relations, University of Indonesia, where she teaches in the areas of globalization, development, and migration. Her main research centers on Indonesia's labor outmigration. She currently focuses on the recruitment process and trafficking experiences of Indonesian migrant fishermen. She holds an M.S. in Foreign Service from Georgetown University.

Michiel Baas holds a Ph.D. in anthropology from the University of Amsterdam. He is currently a Research Fellow with the Migration Cluster of the Asia Research Institute, National University of Singapore. Most of his work is India-focused with a specific interest in new middle-class formations. He has conducted extensive research in the field of Indian migration to Australia and Singapore. Furthermore, more recent work focuses on new middle-class professionals in urban India such as fitness trainers and coffee baristas, a topic which he studies through the lens of social and cultural mobility.

Indrė Balčaitė is currently an independent researcher based in London. In 2016, she earned a Politics Ph.D. from SOAS University of London with a research project on Karen migration based on extended fieldwork in Thailand and Myanmar (Burma). A postdoctoral research fellowship at Central European University in Hungary followed. Her academic interests lie at the intersection of political science, social anthropology, and geography and involve migration, borders, ethnicity, and power.

Praveena Kodoth is a professor at the Centre for Development Studies, Trivandrum, India. Recent research examines questions of state policy and political economy in international migration of women from South India. She has also published papers on gender and caste in the context of arranged matchmaking in Kerala and on the reform of gender and marriage in the context of the transformation of matrilineal society in Malabar in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Nastiti Setia Utami received her bachelor's degree from the Department of International Relations, University of Indonesia, in 2016. She has spent the past few years working in the tech sector, while running community storytelling projects aimed at youth empowerment in Jakarta. Her current interest evolves around social innovation and entrepreneurship.

V. J. Varghese teaches at the Department of History, University of Hyderabad, India. His areas of interest include modern South Asian history, transnational migrations from South Asia, and making of regional modernities in South Asia. He was British Academy Visiting Fellow at the University of Sussex, Visiting Senior Research Fellow at the National University of Singapore, Research Excellence Visiting Fellow at the Central European University, Budapest and Charles Wallace India Trust Fellow at the University of Edinburgh.
